Short of the Finish Line

Despite the hectic pace of dealmaking activity that generated more than 4,000 completed mergers, acquisitions, and divestitures in 1986, the rate of failed deals actually declined compared with 1985. The number of deals or acquisition bids that did not make it to completion for a variety of reasons rose in 1986 to 318 from 281 in 1985, or a gain of 13.1 percent. However, the increase in failed deals trailed the 18.5-percent rise in completed mergers, acquisitions, and divestitures worth in excess of $1 million each. The total of completions reached 4,024.

As a result, for every 12 deals that were completed, only one entered the broken deal category, according to the M&A Data Base. This represented a reduced rate of failure when compared with 1985 when there was one failed deal for every 11 completed.

The M&A Data Base, which contains more than 25,000 transactions completed since 1979, has been including all proposed deals from the time of announcement since January 1984. Thus, it can identify those that fall by the wayside as well as those in which the proposal becomes a finalized transaction.

However, the failure rate reflects only those deals in which a public announcement of an offer or negotiations was made. Deals that may have been proposed or negotiated in secret without a successful completion are not included.

Nearly two-thirds of the failures — or 194 — resulted because the merger partners ended negotiations or broke preliminary agreements. Some of the reasons cited were second thoughts about strategic fit, failure to agree on final terms, changes in conditions in the market in which either the buyer or the target competed, or discovery of adverse information during due diligence proceedings. In 53 cases, the bidder lost out to another suitor while another 39 bids were withdrawn or not pursued after the target rejected them. Regulatory snags, problems in obtaining financing, and successful defenses by the target were other causes of deal and bid failure.

As in the last few years, most of the unsuccessful transactions of 1986 were relatively small in size, although a few qualified as major transactions.

American Express Co. held merger negotiations with E. F. Hutton Group Inc. in one of the largest unsuccessful proposals, but talks ended before a formal offer was made. Beverly Enterprises management planned to take the company private in a $1.7 billion buyout but scrubbed the plan after it was unable to get a fairness opinion. And a group led by Lorimar-Telepictures dropped its proposal to buy six television stations and other assets from SCI Holdings after final terms could not be reached. In the airline industry, UAL discussed acquiring Frontier Airlines but decided not to proceed just before Frontier went into bankruptcy.

The 53 instances in which bidders were beaten out by other acquirers attested to the briskness of the competition for targets during 1986. At times, the successful acquirer was a white knight, such as Unilever which outbid American Brands for Chesebrough-Pond's and the Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts-led leveraged buyout of Safeway Stores which had been the subject of an unwelcome offer by Dart Group. In other cases, the white knight lost, as when Hanson Trust beat out Merrill Lynch for SCM

Corp. and Campeau Corp. outlasted Edward J. DeBartolo in the battle for Allied Stores. In the cases of six targets, there were multiple unsuccessful bids — between two and four — in addition to those that won.

Thirty-nine bids were rejected by the target and not pursued by the bidder. These included the $120-a-share offer by Denver oil magnate Marvin Davis for CBS and Doyle Dane Bernbach's spurning of an acquisition bid by Saatchi & Saatchi. Affiliated Publications met rejection on two bids for newspapers — the Milwaukee Journal and the New Haven Register.

The 10 deals that had to be scuttled because of difficulties in arranging financing were topped by the Wickes Cos. bid for Lear Siegler. Although Wickes had difficulties following through, Lear Siegler later was acquired in a leveraged buyout.

Recaps thwarted bidders

Eight companies managed to fight off hostile bidders through defensive actions such as recapitalizations and restructurings. These included Good-year Tire & Rubber which fought off Sir James Goldsmith; Union Carbide which was attacked by GAF Corp.; Owens-Corning which was under seige by Wickes Cos.; Carter Hawley Hale which was subject to an offer by The Limited and Edward J. DeBartolo; Mayflower Group which was targeted by Laidlaw Transportation; Strawbridge & Clothier which was stalked by Berry Acquisition; and Phillips Van Heusen which received an unwanted bid from a group of private investors. While NL Industries fended off an initial bid by Coniston Partners, it later was acquired by a company led by Dallas investor Harold Simmons.

Regulatory problems killed 14 deals, including attempts by Coca-Cola to acquire Dr Pepper and PepsiCo to acquire Seven-Up. □

With Three Companies That Have Opted for External Expansion

Joseph E. McCann and William G. Cornelius

Conventional wisdom is that small, high-growth companies emphasize internal expansion or are themselves acquired. But an intensive survey of expanding firms found that about a third of them are acquirers. Most likely to buy are concerns that are publicly owned and in business for 10 years.

ALTHOUGH SMALL, RAPIDLY growing firms usually are characterized by their concentration on internal expansion, a good number are active in the acquisition market as well. A survey covering a sample of nearly 800 modest-sized concerns that qualified as being among the nation's fastest growing found that just over a third of them had made at least one acquisition during five-year periods of evaluation prior to their listing by Inc. magazine. The proportion of acquirers is significant not only because of the perception that small companies stress internal growth through increased sales of existing products and development of new ones, but because expanding smaller firms are themselves popular acquisition targets. Our finding also suggests that a small size does not have to be a barrier to making an acquisition.

The conclusions were based on a sample of 799 companies that appeared at least once on Inc. magazine's annual lists of the nation's fastest growing small companies between 1980 and 1985. To qualify for the list, a company with a high rate of sales growth had to have sales of at least $100,000 but less than $25 million for the first year of a five-year range that preceded its inclusion. Of the 799 middle-market companies, 274, or 34.3 percent, had made at least one acquisition.

However, the acquiring group was not evenly distributed across the sample by size and type of company. The highest incidences of acquisition fell among publicly held firms and older companies — in existence for more than 10 years — with nearly half in both ownership and age categories having acquisition histories. In addition, firms at the lowest end of the growth-rate scale and those with the lowest rates of profitability tended to be more acquisition-oriented than the sample as a whole.

Four stages of development

These differences can be explained in terms of the life cycle of the rapidly growing firm which involves four separate stages and different corporate development alternatives encountered at each key transition point between those stages. Generally acquisitions become most prominent in the two latter stages — strategic positioning and sustained performance or decline. The life-cycle concept will be explained in more detail later with supporting evidence from the actual developmental strategies of four small, high-growth companies — Jiffy Lube International Inc., Speedee Oil Change, AGS Computers Inc., and MicroPro International Corp.

The survey was designed largely to analyze the acquisition orientation of small, fast-growing concerns and identify the types of companies in this area that are most likely to seek development through external expansion.

Joseph E. McCann is Associate Professor of Management at Emory University and William G. Cornelius is former Director of the m&a program at the University of Florida.

The sample broke down into 407 privately owned and 392 publicly owned companies. (The total number of firms and the number of privately owned companies were limited because the roster of privately owned firms for 1985 was not available at the time of our analysis.)

Almost by definition, the survey includes some biases that are linked to using sales growth as the key measure of performance. For example, 73 percent of the 799 companies were in existence 10 years or less. This should not be considered unusual because it is difficult to maintain extremely high growth rates as a company ages. Thus, it is not coincidental that the older firms in the sample, although their growth rates were still sufficient to make the Inc. lists, might have turned more frequently to acquisitions.

Another bias, also not surprising, is that the sample is dominated by companies which operate in the fastest-growing spheres of the economy. Thirty-five percent were service firms and 28 percent from high technology for a total of 63 percent. Only 19 percent were from manufacturing. The remaining 18 percent were from a category classified as "other," a catch-all designation that included all types of companies that could not be easily compartmentalized into services, manufacturing, or high technology.

Growth rates varied, although nearly 97 percent chalked up growth of 51 percent or better. The largest group, nearly 41 percent, was in the 100 to 149 percent tier and nearly as many, or 38 percent, grew in the 51 to 99 percent range. Nearly a fifth did greater than 150 percent.

Profit data were available for only 724 of the sample companies. Twelve percent of them were unprofitable, not startling considering the capital demands on young firms with records of great growth. Others fared better but with varying results. Based on net income as a percentage of sales, 41 percent had margins of 6 to 15 percent, more than 39 percent were in the one to 5 percent area, and 8 percent topped the 15 percent mark.

These breakdowns figured strongly in acquisition activity. More than 48 percent of the publicly held companies made acquisitions compared with only a fifth of the private firms and nearly 70 percent of the acquiring firms were publicly held. Nearly half the firms that were older than 10 years, or 49.5 percent, had made acquisitions compared with 30 percent of the younger firms that dominated the total sample.

The most likely buyers

As for profitability, acquisitions were more likely to be made by the firms with lower degrees of earning power. Profitability data were available for 259 of the 274 acquiring firms. Nearly 42 percent of the acquirers posted margins in the one to 5 percent range and more than 48 percent of the unprofitable companies were acquirers. By contrast, acquisitions were logged by less than a third of the firms in the 6 to 15 percent profitability range and less than a fourth of those enjoying margins of greater than 15 percent. Thus, nearly three of the five acquiring firms were in the lowest rankings of profitability.

Acquisition orientation also was strongest among the "slower" growing companies, although activity was spread more evenly by growth rate than in the other categories. Forty-three percent of the companies in the 51 to 99 percent growth range made acquisitions. There were only 22 companies in the sample with growth of 50 percent or less and nine of them, or 41 percent, had acquisition histories. A quarter of the firms in the 100 to 149 percent growth range and more than a third with growth of 150 percent or greater also had made acquisitions. As a result, the total of acquiring companies was split evenly between the highest-growth and the lowest-growth companies. The firms with growth rates of less than 100 percent accounted for 50.7 percent of the acquiring companies, barely nosing out the acquirers with growth in excess of 100 percent.

While these patterns appear clear, both previous research that we conducted on a smaller sample of growth companies and this expanded survey showed that acquisitiveness was not significantly related to either firm growth rate or profitability.

When broken out by industry, the data from the Inc. sample showed that firms in the catch-all "other" category had the highest incidences of acquisition as 43.5 percent of the firms in this classification made at least one external deal. Manufacturing, in which 34.2 percent of the companies made acquisitions, and services, in which 35.7 percent executed such transactions, were close to the average of the entire sample. But high technology lagged — with only 26.8 percent of the firms in that field making acquisitions.

Differences across industry can be due to many factors. Under Inc.'s reporting format, it is not possible to tell what type of firm was acquired. The target's type can reveal the diversification strategy the acquiring firm is utilizing. Is it buying similar firms to expand geographical scope, related firms to vertically integrate, or unrelated firms to go into entirely new product or service markets? Geographical diversification is most likely for a services industry firm since a local presence is often needed. A high technology firm with manufacturing plants may execute acquisitions as part of a vertical integration strategy to get control of costs or product quality. Vertical integration within a services industry conceivably is less likely. The reasons also may be structural. Christopher Roser of Ladenburg, Thalman & Co., a New York-based investment banking firm specializing in middle-market concerns, suggests that smaller firms may find acquisitions easier and cheaper in a more fragmented, less capital intensive services industry than in a high technology industry.

Keying acquisitions to phases

The major need for acquisitions and the greatest opportunities to make them occur at two critical transition points in the life cycle of smaller, growth firms. The life-cycle concept says that a firm will evolve over time through identifiable stages, with each stage varying in duration and significance for the specific concern. Each stage poses unique choices to management that will determine its future direction and performance. Life-cycle concepts are well established in the strategic management literature and have been used to describe new venture initiation. Our four-stage model includes start-up, take-off, strategic positioning, and sustained performance or decline.

The start-up stage firm is concerned most critically with establishing a viable market presence, often with scarce resources. Products or services also must be refined for delivery to large markets. There is typically little motivation for acquisitions due to management's total preoccupation with establishing this initial presence. Nor are there many opportunities to exploit, because of limited and already committed financial resources. The focus is decidedly internal at this stage.

In the take-off stage, presence is being established, and the key challenge before management is keeping up with rapid growth while maintaining product or service quality. Financial resources also can be very stretched as capacity is added to meet growth. Management may begin looking at acquisitions in this stage to bring capacity online faster and extend geographical scope. However, it most likely is easier to extend an already existing product line or add services than to acquire. While opportunities for acquisitions increasingly present themselves when the firm is more established, acquisitions demand time to integrate and may move the firm into unfamiliar markets too quickly. Nor may the inherent competitive advantages or weaknesses of the firm be recognized yet, thus precluding management's attempts to exploit advantages or fill gaps with acquisitions. For the most part, management remains internally preoccupied in this stage.

Exceptions can, of course, be found because some firms do make acquisitions in these stages. Jiffy Lube International, for example, was founded in 1979 and made the Inc. 500 private firm list in 1985 with a compounded, five-year growth rate of 2,417 percent and $6 million in sales. It went public in July 1986. A Baltimore-based oil change franchiser with extensive capital backing from Pennzoil Co., Jiffy Lube has, according to John Sasser, chief financial officer, placed a high priority on acquisitions, having made five of them to date. An internal acquisition team has been formed and is headed by a full-time "acquisition manager." Jiffy's growth is primarily from building new outlets but it is interesting that it includes acquisitions in its development plans. Conversely, Speedee Oil Change, another oil change franchiser which hit the 1985 Inc. list with a 2,158-percent growth rate and $2.5 million in sales, is totally committed to internal growth. Because of the ready availability of prospective franchisees, acquisitions have not been needed. Jiffy's capital resources likely have made acquisitions easier as well. Acquisitions in the take-off stage appear to be a matter of management choice, and are not common among very young firms.

The strategic positioning stage is entered as the rapidly growing firm begins to consolidate its initial growth and rationalize its structure and operations. It is time to take a deep breath, look around, and figure out how to best position the firm for long-term, sustained growth. The rate of growth may begin to slow in this stage, but profitability should begin to improve as gains from early market entry can be reaped. While additional research is needed to validate this hypothesis, it is likely that services industry firms enter this stage sooner than high technology firms due to the large capital investments needed in high technology. It simply takes longer for profits to be realized by high-tech companies.

The firm is presented with two major choices at this stage. One choice concerns the type of ownership to take the firm into the future — stay privately held, go public, or be acquired by another firm. The second choice concerns whether it should begin making acquisitions or continue emphasizing internal growth. Many rapidly growing firms go public or make acquisitions sooner than others, but these two choices are considered by all firms at some point in their lives. Firms are, of course, very much influenced by the philosophies of their founders, industry characteristics, and their own unique experiences up to that time. The timing of these two choices therefore will vary.

A time to buy

It is at this stage, however, that acquisitions begin not only to make more sense, but become more feasible. Financial capacity has improved. Management is more experienced and knows the industry's competitive structure better. Executives also may have more time to devote to searching, negotiating, and integrating acquisitions. Acquisitiveness becomes an opportunistically driven exercise designed to position the firm for sustained growth.

acquisitions have become an important part of its long-term growth strategy. Its 10 acquisitions make it one of the most acquisitive firms in the entire sample. Dick Thatcher, head of corporate development at AGS, noted that the firm's goal is to meet the "normal" 20-percent industry growth rate from continuing operations and add an additional 5 percent to 10 percent via acquisitions. Chairman Larry Schoenberg and President Joe Abrams had acquisition experience at other companies and a strong sense of what firms should be acquired and how. The corporate development unit headed by Thatcher is an attempt to guide this systematic growth via acquisition, and the creation of such a unit is a clear sign of the firm's choice.

On the other hand, MicroPro, the creator of WordStar software, chose not to make acquisitions since its founding in 1978 up to its listing on Inc.'s roster of publicly held firms in 1985. MicroPro, headquartered in San Rafael, Calif., was privately held until 1984, and the absence of acquisitions during this period reflected a very strong emphasis upon internal growth. As Lee Lensky, MicroPro's public relations manager, pointed out, there was no need to worry about acquisitions when the firm was growing as fast as it could — 4,393 percent from 1980 to 1984, when sales reached $66.9 million.

MicroPro made its first acquisition, a small start-up firm with a WordStar-compatible product, in October 1986. The stated philosophy of MicroPro had been to focus on product spin-offs and improvements to WordStar. However, with a sizable cash reserve and a shift in strategy to at least consider acquisitions, MicroPro is looking at deals that can provide "great immediate and technical value." MicroPro continues to exhibit no sense of urgency to take an active acquisitions path. It has made its choice, but the choice is far from irrevocable.

There is little question that public ownership provides an attractive vehicle for making acquisitions. The availability of tradable stock as an acquisition currency is a major reason. The successful privately held firm with large cash reserves also can afford to make acquisitions, but it certainly will be constrained in the number and size of deals it can execute. The ability to make cheaper and larger acquisitions explains why publicly held firms tend to make more acquisitions.

The final stage, sustained performance or decline, describes the transition point in the firm's life cycle at which its fate is revealed — long-term growth, "bumping along" with only average performance, or even decline. In this stage, historically high rates of growth have peaked, and the firm either has plateaued or been caught in competitive pressures that may temper growth rates. Profitability also may begin to level off, if not decline. Firms tend to fall off Inc.'s lists in this stage.

A company suffering setbacks can, of course, experience a resurgence and go on to new peaks of performance, and it is in this stage that acquisitions are considered as a way of breathing new life into the firm. Companies in this stage frequently are sold to larger firms to get new infusions of capital and access to new markets. Larger firms are interested in acquiring them because they believe that their greater resources and skills can turn the targets around or keep them moving forward.

Acquisitions of other small firms represent another alternative. They are motivated by desires to gain access to new markets, products, or services. Rapid growth, it is assumed, can be revived by a series of acquisitions. The impact upon profitability, however, is not clear. Management's motivations have shifted from exploiting opportunities in the strategic positioning stage to recovering past performance levels in the final stage when a level of maturity has been reached.

Our study has revealed that small, rapidly growing firms indeed make acquisitions but do them selectively. The pattern suggests that external expansion is heaviest among the older, the publicly owned, and the slower growing members of the fast-track set, and that service firms, for structural reasons, are more inclined toward acquisitions than other industries.

However, the results also suggest there is no significant relationship between acquisitions and performance, in terms of growth rate and profitability, indicating that buyers have experienced mixed results with their purchases. This further suggests that either acquisitions do not significantly impact the performance of the buying companies or that internal expansion produces such high degrees of growth and profitability that acquisitions provide only marginal contributions. When juxtaposed with our four-stage life-cycle model, our findings lead to the conclusion that acquisitions by "younger" firms are made largely when they reach later stages which involve the securing or revival of performance for the longer run.

For practical reasons, it would be useful to know more about the factors that shape developmental choices for fast-growing, younger companies. Certainly, m&a and development professionals who serve the middle market would find it useful in designing quality services that can be of most help to emerging companies. ■

Identifying the Acquirers On the Rapid-Growth Track

Inc. magazine annually lists the 100 fastest-growing public and 500 fastest-growing private companies in the manufacturing, mining, and service industries. The company must have an operating/sales history for at least the five years prior to and including the ranking year, with an increase in sales in the final year of ranking. Sales must be at least $100,000, but less than $25 million, during the first year of the five-year range. The top 100 public and top 100 private firms are ranked by Inc. by percentage increases in sales (compounded over the most recent four-year period). Data on sales, net income, age, number of employees, and acquisitions are included for most, but not all, companies.

No claim is made that these criteria result in a random sample of small firms. The final sample is a selectively screened, validated set of firms that can be compared across several interesting dimensions and that represent the "Stars" in terms of growth rate. To minimize the bias from having the same firms appear on the list more than once, only the first listing of a repeating firm was included, thus narrowing the sample to 799. More public than private firms were eliminated, reflecting the relatively greater stability of publicly held firms' growth rates.

Variables examined were compounded annual rate of growth in dollar sales, profitability expressed as net income as a percentage of sales, type of ownership, the firm's industry, age expressed in years, and acquisitiveness. Inc. reported profits for private companies in four categories: 16 percent or more, 6 percent to 15 percent, one percent to 5 percent, and loss. The public sample was also converted to these four categories. Age was in five ranges: zero to 10 years (a firm was at least five years old to be listed), 11 to 15 years, 16 to 20 years, 21 to 25 years, and more than 25 years. Finally, because Inc. reported the total number of acquisitions in one sample, but reported only "yes/no" responses in several others, all acquisition data were converted to "yes/no." That is, a firm either acquired at least one new organization during a reporting period or it did not.

We reclassified the industry breakdowns into these four major categories to build statistically large subsample sizes: high technology, manufacturing, services, and other. This classification reflected our primary interest in comparing the first three industries as part of a long-term research project.

Tender Offer Update: 1987

Douglas V. Austin, Kimberly A. Nigem, and Craig D. Bernard

The number and dollar volume of tender offers climbed sharply in 1986. The need for fast execution of acquisitions was a primary factor.

THE LATE 1986 FLURRY of merger and acquisition activity designed to beat the effect of new federal tax laws helped spur a strong increase in tender offer activity for the year. Companies desirous of completing deals by December 31 seized on the tender's advantages of speed to execute transactions of all sizes, including some very big ones. But tender activity also was brisk earlier in the year. As a result, the number of tenders climbed 51.2 percent from the 1985 level to 183 bids, the highest number since we began keeping data in 1978. Dollar volume of all tenders — both successful and unsuccessful — mounted to $60.5 billion or the second highest on record (see Table 1). The dollar increase from 1985 was 29.3 percent.

Dr. Douglas V. Austin is Professor of Finance at the University of Toledo and President of Douglas Austin & Associates Inc., a financial consulting firm. Kimberly A. Nigem and Craig D. Bernard are Associates at the firm.

Despite the greater incidence, the total of tender offers represented only 4.5 percent of the 4,024 m&a completions compiled by the M&A Data Base in 1986. But the tender remained an important method of executing large transactions. Ten completed tenders were worth in excess of $1 billion (see Table 2) and 59 were valued at $100 million or greater.

The success rate for all tenders rose slightly in 1986 to 72.2 percent and the success rate for uncontested tenders was nearly 95 percent for the second straight year. For the first time on record, not a single contested bid succeeded and a record proportion of hostile offers — in excess of 90 percent — were failures. Cash intensified its position as the predominant acquisition currency in tenders with about 93 percent of the bids being for cash, up from 90 percent in 1985.

Premiums, however, responded only modestly to the increased tender activity with the average premium for 1986 being 30.5 percent. This was up a bit from 27.2 percent in 1985, but down from 31 percent in 1984, and 39 percent in 1983.

Tenders were used to complete the third largest acquisition of 1986, the Safeway Stores Inc. leveraged buyout for $5.3 billion; the fourth largest, Burroughs Corp. $4.4 billion acquisition of Sperry Corp. (to form Unisys Corp.); and the fifth largest, the $3.6 billion purchase of Allied Stores Corp. by Campeau Corp. The Allied acquisition was the biggest completed contested tender of the year.

Unsuccessful tenders of large magnitude included the Dart Group Corp.'s $3.7 billion bid for Safeway, the Revlon Group's $3.5 billion offer for Gillette Co., Edward J. DeBartolo Corp.'s $3.3 billion effort to acquire Allied Stores, and American Brands Inc.'s $2.8 billion offer for Chesebrough-Pond's Inc. which later was purchased by Unilever NV.

The rate of complete success on all tender offers for which outcomes are available reached 72.2 percent in 1986 from 68.6 percent in 1985 (see Table 3). Another 5.1 percent of the 1986 offers were partially successful against 6.6 percent in 1985. A partially successful offer designated as a lowered bid in the table is one in which the bidder accepted less than the minimum number of requested shares. When the successful and partially successful outcomes were combined, the 1986 rate was 77.3 percent against 75.2 percent in 1985. The number of unsuccessful offers rose in 1986 to 40 from 30 in 1985 but the proportion of failed bids fell to 22.7 percent from 24.8 percent. Historically, the unsuccessful rate has hovered around 25 percent. When the uncontested offers were segregated, the success rates were unchanged at 94.8 percent (see Table 4).

However, two uncontested offers failed in 1986 because of problems in obtaining financing. One aborted tender was Wickes Cos.' $1.6 billion offer for Lear Siegler Inc. which later was acquired in an

LBO. The other deal that fell through was a small one that involved Seahawk Oil International Inc.'s bid for Oxoco Inc.

Without a single contested bid succeeding in 1986, the failure rate for hostile tenders surged to 90.5 percent. The rate of failure was nearly 70 percent in both 1984 and 1985 and has been rising through the 1980s. However, 9.5 percent of the contested offers were partially successful in 1986. The rising failure rate paralleled a basic decline in successful contested bids although 1986 was the first on record without the successful completion of a hostile bid, based on known results. In the 1983-85 period, nearly one of every four hostile offers succeeded.

The number of hostile offers held basically steady — 42 in 1986 and 43 in 1985. But, as a proportion of all offers, hostile offers declined sharply in 1986 when just over 22 percent of the total tender offers were contested against nearly 36 percent the year before.

of tenders followed three straight years of increasing incidence and the exact reasons require more time to determine. However, it is known that corporate buyers have been noticeably reluctant in recent years to pursue hostile offers and there may be realistic limits to the number of deals that the prominent raiders or financial entrepreneurs can try in one year. Toward the end of 1986, moreover, some well-known raiders were having problems raising funds in the junk bond market, at least in part because of the fallout from the insider trading scandals.

An offer is classified as contested if there was resistance by the target's board or shareholders. If the target dropped its initial opposition because of a sweetened bid or other reasons, the offer is reclassified and appears in the data as uncontested. The bids listed as contested in the tables were hostile from start to finish.

Of the 183 offers in 1986, 171, or 93.4 percent, were for cash (see Table 5). The 72.5 percent success rate for cash offers was higher than the 1985 figure of nearly 69 percent. Nine other cash offers were partially successful. The unsuccessful rate in 1986, based on 38 unsuccessful cash offers, fell to 22.2 percent from nearly 26 percent.

The contraction of tender offer premiums in many respects mirrors a general decline in m&a premiums in recent years that has been at least partially attributed to rising stock market prices of target companies. However, premium data are somewhat incomplete because premiums could not be calculated on 29 offers in 1986 and 37 in 1985. Inability to calculate a premium usually occurs because the target's stock is infrequently traded or is not traded in an organized public market.

For the 148 deals included in premium calculations in 1986, the premiums are based on the market price two weeks before the offer (see Table 6). At the upper end of the scale, there were three deals with premiums of 100 percent or more, against none in 1985, and 20 others in the 50 to 99 percent range compared with 10 in 1985. But offsetting those positive premium trends, 84.5 percent of all offers for which premiums could be calculated carried premiums of less than 50 percent and the largest blocks were in the 19 percent or less range. Seven of the offers were at negative premiums, or less than the market price two weeks before the offer. The three offers with 100 percent premiums were successful (see Table 7). Five with negative premiums were successful and one was partially successful.

No significant conclusions could be drawn in correlating results with premium size (see Table 8). ■

Freeing Trapped Equity: A Tax Spur to Friendly Deals

damage that highly leveraged takeovers might produce in other cases, and referred the question of principle back to the Bank of England, the London Stock Exchange, and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Although it was not clearly articulated, there seems to be concern that bankruptcy involves costs to third parties that cannot be internalized at the time when the original debt contract is drawn up. Although there is some truth in this view, it has nothing to do with the use of debt to finance takeovers as opposed to other types of investment. Apart from the general monitoring role of the Bank of England, there is no official policy of controlling the level of gearing chosen by companies. It is not clear that takeovers should be treated as a special case.

The motive of the trapped equity model is to provide a systematic explanation of the relationship between takeover activity and changes in the stock market. The correlation between takeover activity in the U.K. and the U.S. suggests that there is more to the phenomenon than specific factors (such as the need for restructuring in the oil and gas and broadcasting industries) identified by some U.S. commentators, that have little relevance to the U.K. because of state ownership or control of the relevant industries. In the U.K., takeover activity in 1985 and 1986 was especially high in the food and retailing industries.

For the economy as a whole, takeover activity is a means of getting money out of the corporate sector without incurring the additional taxes levied on the corporate form. In the trapped equity model, the company does not consciously do this when deciding to make an acquisition, but the effect, for takeovers financed by debt or cash, is a withdrawal of funds from the corporate sector. ■ purchasing and marketing decisions, discontinued marginal lines, refitted some stores, and changed other locations. The results to date have been impressive: Curry's sales are up 27 percent and pretax profits have doubled since the acquisition.

A number of successful acquisitions are based on capturing synergies between and among the acquired businesses and those of the acquiring parent. The benefits can stem from horizontal or vertical integrations to secure market access or increased bargaining power, or from operational improvements made possible through cost sharing or economies of scale. This approach requires some degree of postacquisition integration to capture the synergies.

The critical integration issue

An example of vertical and/or horizontal integration that seeks to create competitive advantage by capitalizing on synergies and efficiencies among businesses that are unavailable to stand-alone competitors, is Great Universal Stores' diversification into the financial services business. The marriage of GUS's mail-order and credit-scoring businesses with financial and insurance acquisitions has created a new product distribution channel unavailable to other financial services companies. Subsequent horizontal acquisitions have been designed to create value from a broad range of financial products. Financial services contributed 25 percent of GUS profits by 1985. While the outcome has yet to be determined, Saatchi & Saatchi's efforts to create synergies across a broad range of business services (advertising, marketing, consulting) is another example of this strategy.

Acquisitions to capture operational synergies include those that share costs (e.g., advertising), capture scale economies (e.g., in technology, purchasing, or manufacturing), and consolidate overhead, sales forces, distribution, or manufacturing plants. Several of the successful long-term acquisition programs in our analysis were in the food retailing industry, where the ability to consolidate purchasing and distribution systems can lead to significant value added. Another example is Tarmac, which has successfully exploited its in-depth expertise in building materials in a series of small acquisitions since the mid-1970s. Tarmac achieves the majority of its value-adding synergy by working below the revenue line (i.e., on costs) by consolidating staff functions and sales forces.

Mergers and Acquisitions in Key National Markets

Reliable statistics on foreign merger and acquisition activity are difficult to gather. Definitions of mergers differ from country to country and reporting requirements usually are looser than in the United States. As noted, the data for Spain and Italy are estimates. The figures for West Germany and France are only for registered or published transactions. M&A professionals in those countries estimate there actually may have been as many as 430 deals in France in 1985 and more than 450 in 1986 and that actual totals in Germany were well in excess of 1,000 transactions in both of those years. Data for Japan also may understate activity in the area of substantial equity investments by one company in another. The burden of reporting domestic transactions in Japan is on the target but unless the purchaser presses for the fruits of its investment — such as receiving dividends or taking board or management control — it does not have to tell the target of its stake.

Dispersion of Risk Through Multinational Teamwork

Farok J. Contractor

Firms in industries as varied as automaking and leather goods have formed cross-border joint ventures. The partners are seeking to cut financial and political risks, as well as reduce uncertainties.

IN THE BROADEST TERMS, joint ventures achieve three strategy objectives. These are uncertainty reduction, cost reductions through synergies and efficiencies, and overcoming entry barriers to markets not served by the company.

Risk Reduction. Developing a new car or airplane is a multibillion dollar undertaking. First, to state the obvious, a joint venture spreads the risk of failure (and the potential gains) over more than one party, particularly useful when development costs are increasing and product cycles are shrinking.

Second, a joint venture enables product portfolio diversification at lower capital costs, a consideration illustrated by the General Motors-Toyota automaking venture.

To the extent that GM did not sink $2.5 billion into developing a new small car in the U.S., it could invest the capital over a range of larger models. Given the public's fluctuating taste for smaller vs. larger automobiles — something Detroit has been unsuccessful in predicting over the last two business cycles and oil shocks — a diversification of the product portfolio insulates auto producers from such variability in demand.

Farok J. Contractor is Associate Professor and Chairman, Environment Area, in the Graduate School of Management, Rutgers University. This article is excerpted from his article in the Spring 1986 issue of International Marketing Review, London.

Third, a joint venture can lower the total investment cost of a particular project or the assets at risk by combining expertise and slack facilities in the parent firms. Finally, the experience of all the partners, their mutual sharing or abdication of markets in favor of the joint venture corporation, make for faster entry, quicker payback, and lower risk.

Economies of Scale and Production Rationalization. Another broad rationale for forming a joint venture is a reduction in cost or an efficiency gain. The global automobile industry provides several examples of links between companies for this purpose.

"I think world trade in built-up vehicles will be largely replaced by trade-in vehicle components . . . The distinction between imports and domestics could very well become meaningless" (Donald Peterson, President of Ford Motor Co. in the International Herald Tribune, September 1981).

Underlying this remark are two distinct but related concepts. Production rationalization means that certain components or subassemblies are no longer made in two locations with unequal costs. Production of this item is transferred to the lower cost location which enjoys a comparative cost advantage. That fact in itself lowers sourcing cost. But there is an added advantage. Because volume in the other location now is higher, further reduction in average unit cost is possible due to economies of larger scale.

GM has an extensive global interchange between its affiliates and joint venture partners such as Isuzu Motors Ltd. and Suzuki Motors Co. Ltd. (in which it has had an admittedly passive equity stake, so far). Japan serves as a source for transaxles (transmission plus axle subassemblies) for assembly in Canada, Europe, South Africa, and Australia.

Complementary Technologies and Patents. The third broad rationale has to do with technology strategy in each partner firm.

Joint ventures may be formed in order to pool the complementary technologies of the partners. Several in the pharmaceutical and biotechnology fields have this rationale. Each partner contributes a missing piece. By pooling patents, a superior product is expected.

Moreover, faster entry into a market may be possible if the testing and certification done by one partner are accepted by the authorities in the other partner's territories. Or, one partner may cede the rights to a partially developed process to another firm which refines it further, the fruits of the development to be shared in a joint venture.

In this regard, it is useful to remember that a patent is not merely a right to a process or design, it is also a right to a territory. Often, the marketing or territorial right is the dominant strategic issue. By pooling or swapping patents, companies also pool or swap territories (Contractor 1985).

Co-opting or Blocking Competition. Potential or existing competition can be co-opted by forming a joint venture regardless of the existence of patents. The majority of these ventures are defensive strategic moves. Besides other considerations, blunting the Japanese auto penetration into the U.S. market is a likely rationale for the GM-Toyota venture.

On the other hand, a joint venture also may be made offensively to block a third company. Hout, Porter and Rudden (1982) relate how Caterpillar Tractor Co. linked up with Mitsubishi Corp. in order to reduce the profits and market share of their common competitor Komatsu Ltd. Even though the Caterpillar-Mitsubishi joint venture is only for Japan, that country is said to produce "80 percent of Komatsu's worldwide cash flow." The joint venture in Japan may not have great importance in itself for Caterpillar. But it acts as a thorn in Komatsu's side and reduces its competitiveness outside Japan.

Overcoming Government-Mandated Trade Barriers. Here we come to the older and still common rationale for joint ventures because host government policy makes that the only way to enter a market. Hence American Motors Corp.'s venture with Beijing Auto Works to produce a vehicle in China, and GM's venture with LZTK in Yugoslavia. In the latter case, the joint venture in fact produces castings which GM buys for its German assembly lines. In return, GM is able to sell more cars in Yugoslavia, by way of countertrade (Barkas and Gale 1981). These protectionist policies are not exclusive to LDCs or planned economies: Mariti and Smiley (1983) describe how NATO prefers that weapons systems be developed by multinational consortia; Canada restricted foreign equity shares in some industries; and the protectionist policies of Japan are well known. The Conoco-Nissan tie in the chemicals sector is one of hundreds of examples of American firms using the joint venture route as the only practical way to sell products in the Japanese market (Abegglen 1982).

Initial International Expansion. For medium or small-sized companies lacking international experience, their initial overseas expansion is more likely to be a joint venture. This is especially true when the firm is from a socialist or developing country (Lall 1981). In a cross-sectional study, Dunning and Cantwell (1983) show that, the lower the GDP per capita of the host nation originating a multinational firm, the more likely it is to use joint ventures in its initial international expansion. In a typical scenario, this firm has production capability, but lacks knowledge of foreign markets for which it depends on its partner. Examples include LZTK and GM in castings, Tata of India and TFR of France in leather goods, and Embraer of Brazil and Piper Aircraft in small planes.

It is even true for the United States. Few realize that a majority of American investments abroad are based on a less-than-100-percent ownership of the foreign affiliate. In fact, minority foreign affiliates almost equal majority-owned affiliates by number. Most of the former are owned by small and medium-sized U.S. companies.

Vertical Quasi-Integration. Joint ventures can be a form of vertical quasi-integration. Each partner may contribute one or more elements in the production and distribution chain. Joint ventures can be described as a mode of interfirm cooperation lying in between the extremes of complete vertical integration in one company of the chain from raw materials to the consumer, to the opposite case where stages of production and distribution are owned by separate companies which contract with each other.

Empirically, the latter is observed only rarely. Examples may be found in pockets of the music and publishing industries. One even encounters firms with no assets, other than an office, undertaking production and sales by contracting out each stage to separate organizations, and simply "managing" the entire chain. But such one-time contracts mean that none of the parties accept any obligation for future behavior. Strategy in any long-term sense is impossible.

A firm may therefore integrate vertically and own more than one stage of the chain, because it permits longer-run strategic decisions. There is substantial literature on vertical integration for the international firm (Richardson 1972; and Buckley and Casson 1976). Briefly stated, its advantages are:

- Avoidance of interfirm contracting, transactions, and negotiations costs (Williamson 1975);

- Reduction in cost, or economies of scale from combining common administrative, production, transport, or information-processing activities in two or more stages of production or distribution;

- Internalizing technological or administrative abilities and secrets within a single firm;

- Gaining a better understanding of strategy within the industry as a whole (this enables the integrated firm to outperform its more fragmented competitors); and

- The ability to implement technological changes more quickly and over more stages of production.

On the other hand, there are drawbacks to integration. The greater the degree of integration, and the longer the chain stretches geographically, the more acute are the drawbacks.

First, there is the matter of capital investment cost which may become too high for just one company to bear, especially in a risky environment. We see that many joint ventures in uncertain investment fields such as semiconductor R&D or oil exploration are predicated simply on spreading the investment cost and risk.

Second, the vertically integrating firm tends to increase its fixed costs and its break-even point, thus increasing its vulnerability to cyclical fluctuation. In the aerospace industry, the cost of developing new airplanes is very high for even the big players like Boeing Co., and demand fluctuates widely with the business cycle (Moxon and Geringer 1984). The Boeing 767 is being built in a cooperative venture with Japan Commercial Aircraft Co. and Aeritalia. Not only are the development risks shared, but fixed costs of Boeing are lowered by contracting major portions of the aircraft to the other partners.

Penetration of markets

Third, forward integration to internalize more elements of marketing channels requires market access, links with major buyers, and brand-name recognition which can be a critical impediment in international expansion. The history of Japanese firms expanding into the U.S. market shows that in the early stages they would link up with existing U.S. companies. This link gave them a long learning period before developing channels of their own.

Finally, Porter (1980) indicates some other strategic disadvantages of full integration such as reduced flexibility to environmental or technological change; "dulled incentives" for an individual operating unit to remain competitive if internal transfer prices do not reflect their external values; and the deprivation of marketing or technical insights available from outsiders.

Joint ventures provide a middle position which is optimal for many companies between the two extremes of full integration and purely contractual relationships. They provide a means whereby each partner can contribute their distinctive competencies. Many of the specific obligations of each partner may be defined in auxiliary agreements. Because they share the equity of the venture, the two firms perceive that they have an overlapping if not identical strategy. The relationship is neither purely contractual, nor is it entirely integrative. We may describe it as a mode of quasi-integration (Blois 1972).

There is no typical example. Take the case of a hotel joint venture located in the Middle East. One partner, an international hotel chain based in the U.S., supplies expertise in terms of operating procedures, standards, and building codes to construct and start the hotel. Thereafter, the other partner, a hotel company based in India, staffs and runs the operation using local and expatriate Indian personnel who are hired at relatively modest salary. The American partner furthermore provides worldwide brand recognition and a global reservation system.

Under "production" inputs, a partner may contribute materials, technology, personnel, or capital. These contributions are self-evident. But an important bargaining chip in the so-called "planned economies" may simply be the permission to produce that a firm has already received from its own government. In many nations, permission is necessary even for local firms, before they can begin to produce. In several industrial sectors, foreigners may be excluded altogether. This is a similar but distinct issue compared with trade barriers which involve an inability to sell. In the latter case, what one partner seeks from the other is production destined for other markets.

Take the case of Marine Resources Co. in Seattle, a joint venture between Bellingham Cold Storage and Sovrybflot, possibly the only joint venture in the United States with Soviet equity participation (Pereyra 1981). The joint venture was predicated on the United States extending its offshore economic zone to 200 miles in 1976. The Russians being excluded, Americans now catch the fish.

But the species available include many ordinary varieties such as pollock and whiting which have to be caught and processed quickly in huge quantities to make even a modest profit in international markets. American fleets had neither the huge processing capacity of the Soviet "motherships" nor the expertise for international trade in such species. The factory ships are based in the Soviet Far East and have considerable excess capacity.

At an early stage in the development of fisheries in the U.S. Northwest, investment in a factory ship was out of the question due to inexperience, slim profit margins, and a seasonal catch. Marine Resources Co. contracted with American fishermen for supply of such species and delivery was to be made directly to affiliated Russian factory ships in mid-ocean. The processed catch was to be sold directly to other countries such as Japan or Korea. The joint venture had staff in Seattle, on-board representatives on the Soviet processing ships, and personnel in Nakhodka, U.S.S.R.

Exploring the seabeds

Another variation on this theme of government production permission as a strategic contribution is Kennecott Corp.'s seabed mining consortium. To extract nodules from a depth of three miles is an enormously speculative and costly venture. Killing (1983) reports that a full-scale test alone costs $150 to $200 million. A large number of technical disciplines are needed from several companies.

For this reason, and in order to spread the risk of exploration, Kennecott formed a joint venture with companies from four industrial nations. But another crucial reason was political, to get the support of several governments at a time when negotiations on the Law of the Sea in the U.N. may have gone against the mining companies.

Strategic advantages under the "distribution" category include an existing marketing establishment, links with key buyers, knowledge of the local market and culture, a recognizable brand name, and market access. Tata is a large conglomerate based in India with extensive international contacts. India has potentially a fifth of the world's raw leather but much is wasted. It seemed natural to invest in a leather finishing operation in order to add value to the product before exporting it. Having decided to get into the high-quality end of the business, Tata was faced with the problem of not knowing anything about the international fashion leather market, notwithstanding their expertise in other industries.

The manufacturing-marketing connection

Instead of merely selling the leather as a commodity to independent European importers, a marketing joint venture was to be set up with TFR in France, a significant leather finisher and marketer in Europe. This would integrate the factory in India with the exact color, texture, and other requirements of large European buyers. Making the leather "to order" instead of selling it to agents as a commodity earns higher margins. A European partner would provide an existing marketing establishment, links to key buyers, their name, and reputation, and knowledge of the ever-shifting sands of fashion.

Being a natural substance, leather has inherent variability. Add to that the myriad treatment methods, colors, and finishes and one ends up with thousands of combinations. To produce to a standard fit for the fashion market is therefore as much an art as a production science. A successful operation requires close integration of the factory personnel with marketing staff in Europe.

In the case of a New York restaurant, Sichuan Province of China was to provide only the Chinese chefs, with local investors providing knowledge of the market. The TRW-Fujitsu computer venture for the American market was based on the idea of marrying Fujitsu Ltd.'s hardware with TRW Inc.'s existing distribution network in the U.S. Fujitsu had no experience of selling in the U.S. nor did they have an interest in making the enormous expenditure of establishing a sales organization from scratch. They wished to conserve resources and achieve greater economies of scale in production for the battle with IBM in Japan, their home territory.

Conversely, in the Fuji-Xerox copier venture in Japan, Fuji provided Xerox Corp. an entry into the Japanese market and links with key buyers. The latter is an important consideration in Japan because of their zaibatsu, or business conglomerate organization of industry (Burton and Saelens 1982), where personal contacts and referrals within the group are necessary for sales success. ■

Bucking Tradition In a Promising Market

Arno Burckhardt

West German firms posted a record number of m&a transactions in 1986. But reluctance to sell and the dominance of private firms keep merger activity in check.

MERGER AND ACQUISITION activity involving West German companies produced a record number of deals in 1986 but the market continued to be rather constrained. Although strategically oriented mergers became more prominent, most transactions were motivated by the seller's financial distress.

Recent research on the West German m&a market revealed that more than half of all transactions were completed because the seller had financial problems and that most corporate restructurings in Germany occurred as profits were either insufficient or nonexistent. Only 7 percent of the targets were sold because of inheritance problems, although succession could evolve into a more important element in future decisions to sell.

As a result, the market for healthy, profitable companies remains fairly narrow. The 1986 total of completed m&a transactions was 701, up 21.7 percent from 1985 (see Table 1). It is impossible to estimate the value since purchase prices are reported on few transactions; such requirements, even on public corporations, are minimal in Germany, although the 1986 volume probably exceeded the 1985 level.

Domestic deals accounted for most of the activity, with 426, up 23 percent from 1985. The greatest increase, or 55 percent, took place in acquisitions overseas where German firms bought 107 companies in 1986. Foreign acquisitions in Germany rose by only seven, to 168.

The distribution of acquisitions by product line demonstrated little change in the character of targets (see Table 2). Wholesale companies led in activity with chemicals in second place. But the breakdown suggested that the acquisition was getting increased consideration as a tool for strategic expansion. One interesting trend involved efforts of tire manufacturers to exert stronger control over their markets by acquiring retail tire outlets, leading, in some cases, to battle for control of the chains by several major producers. Continental Gummiwerke AG, the largest German tire manufacturer, was especially successful with nine acquisitions of retailers during 1986.

But the significance of cross-border transactions was underscored in that four of the five largest deals involved a foreign firm on one side (see Table 3).

Despite the lack of great breadth and the absence of a truly free auction market such as those existing in the United States and the United Kingdom, m&a activity should remain at a high level in West Germany in 1987. Continued restructuring of German industry should be one motivator, and increasing inheritance concerns should be another.

Many medium-sized companies, founded after World War II, are now owned by men of retirement age. Their children may be neither suitable successors nor interested in the businesses. This factor should provide an attractive base for m&a consulting firms, and it has attracted many national and international banks into the market. However, few seem to succeed in covering their expenses because only about 15 percent of total transactions are initiated by financial advisers.

Close to the vest

Germans are not very consultant-oriented, and few active sellers will turn to a consultant in search of a potential buyer. Usually, they will talk to a next-door neighbor or a friendly competitor and then engage a lawyer to arrange the transaction. Because many companies are being sold as a result of financial problems, German entrepreneurs are very hesitant to talk to their bankers or other financial advisers about a potential sale. Furthermore, the image of the typical German business broker is not the best, a prejudice that might be influenced by the fact that most brokers provide very limited service and customarily charge fees to both the buyer and seller.

With so much secrecy in the German financial market, very little is revealed about the prices paid for German companies, and the stock market provides little help. The dividend yield of German securities is known, but price/earnings multiples remain a secret, and estimates by financial analysts are normally not compatible with those in companies' annual reports. Consequently, the potential seller often is unaware of the value of his company and naturally overestimates it. German companies generally have a lower return on sales than their American counterparts. This may be the result of different accounting systems and faster depreciation. Usually, however, the profit margin in Germany is lower than in the U.S.

One major obstacle to increased profitability is the German indoctrination to production and marketing rather than to finance. German companies are very likely to make price concessions when they sell their products provided they have covered their fixed costs. Furthermore, the high taxes in Germany encourage owners not to maximize profits but to find ways of saving on taxes. This explains the heavy reliance on real estate investments at very marginal rates of return. Quite often, then, companies are burdened with assets that are not supported by adequate earnings. That factor tends to raise the aver-

M&A in Japan: Halting Steps Toward a New Era

Excerpts From Tokyo Conference on Mergers and Acquisitions

Establishing a Beachhead

For many years, trying to buy a Japanese company has been a frustrating experience for foreign companies. It is likely to remain that way for many more years. There are no targets and there is no market. P/Es are considered outrageous and accounting concepts differ. Psychological and cultural gaps are wide. For many more years, selling the company, especially to foreigners, will be a traumatic experience for Japanese companies.

However, the profile of the players is changing. Targets were traditionally limited to family-owned companies in crisis or to quasi-bankrupt ventures. The trend, however, is that healthy subsidiaries of larger groups and medium-size independents in search of a future may become available for transactions. Well-established U.S. and European corporations are becoming seasoned players in the acquisition game in Japan. International investment banks are training a number of their m&a specialists in the Japanese acquisition game. The Japanese business establishment, both private and government, may see some value in a more fluid acquisition environment open to foreign interests.

The philosophy of the game is changing too. "No other choice" situations will give way to well-planned strategies. The life cycle of corporate strategies is shortening, just as the life cycle of new products. The idea of buying or selling businesses will become natural, just like the idea of buying or selling licenses. Large Japanese groups are moving toward a stricter management of resources. Disposing of assets, which used to be seen as a failure, will tend to be perceived as a management alternative.

In the next five years, there should be:

- ☐ A few-dozen transactions, most of them carried out by well-known players, in a friendly manner;
- ☐ Increasing activities in such fields as pharmaceuticals, food, construction, banking, low-tech, and mechanics;
- ☐ The emergence of an m&a community in the Western sense with specialized bankers, lawyers, auditors, appraisers, financial advisers, brokers, an m&a press, and, even perhaps, m&a stars and scandals;
- ☐ Little change in the financing techniques, and finance will not take the front seat;
- ☐ Limited changes in the legal and tax environment; and
- ☐ Only exceptional cases of foreign corporate raiders, greenmailers, and high-flying arbitrageurs. The m&a scene in Japan is unlikely to be disturbed by foreign interests.

Japan is not for sale and will not be for sale in the near future. However, more than in the past, there will be Japanese companies to sell their past and foreign companies to buy themselves a future.

Rene-Pierre Azria, Banque Indosuez

Caution as a Virtue

Japan has not been a major participant in international m&a. But as Japan's economy grows and Japanese companies increase their foreign assets to become true multinationals, m&a participation is increasing — both Japanese acquisitions overseas and foreign acquisitions in Japan. Successful acquisitions require careful shopping and thoughtful integration of the parent and the new subsidiary, and the high-pressure process — driven by the seller — often precludes this. Therefore, we believe that a slower, more deliberate "Japanese-style" approach to build deep knowledge and close relations can be much more successful than the more famous hostile bid or "corporate raider" approach.

David Roberts, Bain & Co.

Putting Cash to Work

So far, the modest level of Japanese investment abroad has been achieved mainly by acquiring assets or entering into collaborative deals with local industry. However, this is likely to change. There are a number of reasons for this. First, Japan's enormous trade surplus — almost $100 billion — has given rise to a huge pool of cash which will need to be recycled. Second, the strength of the yen makes manufacture in the lower cost markets where Japanese products are sold an essential requirement. Third, existing and threatened trade barriers to imported goods are also driving Japanese companies to locate production capacity in local markets. Whether the expected growth of Japanese business investment abroad continues to follow existing routes or embraces corporate acquisitions is less clear.

Win Bischoff, Schroders PLC

Beyond Land Values

Unlike purchasing securities and land, purchasing companies is very difficult because companies are really a conglomeration of people. In the case of Japan, land prices are sure to go up, so even if the acquired company is in the red year after year, you can make up for that deficit because of rising land prices. In the past, we purchased companies for the purpose of acquiring land at lower prices. But that strategy does not work in the United States.

Work and people are important. If competent engineers, competent marketing people, and others run away from your company, the company will be totally empty. It will be void and that would be very dangerous. So when Japanese companies contemplate purchases of U.S. and European companies, they must be very cautious. We've heard comments that Japanese participation in m&a overseas has been very limited but it's because of this background that it is very difficult for the Japanese to make the decision to go ahead with m&a.

Shigekuni Kawamura, President, Dainippon Ink & Chemicals Inc.

An Economic Necessity

There is a reason that m&a has to take place in Japan today. We have employment adjustment laws. Insurance for the unemployed and other social benefits are still granted to various industries like shipbuilding which are failing. We still have a national budget for that, but there is a limit to the size of that budget and even though we can pay some social benefits, the scale of the fund will shrink. So as we gradually go into that phase when there is a call for mergers and acquisitions, we will have to cope with it.

The reason that mergers and acquisitions are difficult to accomplish in Japan is very similar to the reason that it is very difficult to solve the problem of trade friction. Both the Japanese and overseas financial institutions try to encourage mergers and acquisitions. You might feel that it's not going ahead very smoothly but actually it is just like the case of trade friction.

Takami Takahashi, Director, Minebea Co. Ltd.

Scorecard on Joint Ventures

The joint venture has become an increasingly popular method for companies doing business internationally. This is true for both Japanese companies investing overseas and for foreign companies trying to establish markets in Japan.

But joint ventures still represent a minority of the Japanese investment overseas. A total of 13,000 Japanese companies now have some types of investments or conduct some business outside Japan. Of that total, 1,800 investments involve joint ventures in which the Japanese company has taken on a non-Japanese partner. One of every six joint ventures is in the United States. In addition, 1,900 Japanese joint ventures have gone abroad to do business.

The incidence of joint ventures is greater for foreign companies operating in Japan. There are about 1,140 foreign companies with major investments in Japan — that is, at least 50 million yen each. More than half of those companies, or 680, are in joint ventures with Japanese companies. About 40 percent of the joint ventures, or about 460, are in manufacturing. The indications are that 320 of the manufacturing joint ventures are doing well but the other 140 are not doing well.

Joint ventures offer several advantages to an overseas investor. The foreign company is assured of the quality of the venture's employees, has access to the partner's management base, and can avoid many of the regulations that a country will put on foreign investors. But the disadvantages include limited management control, limitations on the profits that may be obtained by the foreign investor, and the possibility of decisionmaking conflicts between the partners. The joint venture can be attractive but it requires care in structuring and operating to be successful.

Yuichi Yamamoto, Daiwa Securities Co. Ltd.

An Increasing Outward Reach

From January to October of 1986, there were 58 cases of out-of-country m&a activities by Japanese companies. I think there are four main reasons why the number increased so much. There were 80 transactions in the 1970s and 71 from 1981 to 1985.

The first is that domestic demand did not increase as much as had been estimated and the export business was not able to make ends meet due to the high value of the yen. One such case was the acquisition of Calorster Industries in the U.S. by The Setsu. The second reason is that the volume of material procurement from overseas by Japanese companies increased because of the high value of the yen and the materials manufacturers acted in response to this situation. This was the case in the acquisition of Sylteck Corp. in the U.S. by Mitsubishi Metal Co. Ltd.

The third reason was to get around the so-called voluntary export controls in the industry or the compulsory control of exports. This was the reason for the proposed acquisition of Fairchild Industries Inc. by Fujitsu Ltd. The last reason is attributable to the fact that when a company in a mature industry plans to go into a new, developing business, it often seeks to acquire a foreign company to gain a new technology. This was the case in the acquisition of the Raser Inspection division of GCA in the U.S. by Kobe Steel.

Hideo Ishihara, Industrial Bank of Japan

Let the Buyer Take the Lead

Bain & Co. has done an analysis of the stock price of 50 American companies that have made significant acquisitions. The analysis shows that the acquisitions cost the shareholders money in at least half of the cases. That is to say that the shareholders would have been better off if the acquisition had not been made.

We also have interviewed a number of Japanese companies that have made acquisitions in the U.S. Sixty percent said that their acquisitions were performing worse than expected and only about 5 percent said that they were performing better than expected.

There are several proven techniques to decrease the acquirer's risk. One is to carefully weigh acquisition against all other options for achieving corporate objectives. It is very important to be clear about the corporate goal that a U.S. expansion will help achieve. Once the goal is clear, the question becomes whether to acquire a U.S. operation, start from scratch, or do something in between.

A second technique to decrease risk is to actively look for a target company rather than considering the deals that come to you. In a recent Bain analysis of Japanese companies that have made major U.S. acquisitions, we found that the vast majority (90 percent) of such acquisitions have been initiated by the U.S. seller. Additionally we found that the Japanese company was generally not satisfied with the financial performance of seller-initiated acquisitions in 88 percent of the cases. On the other hand, there was satisfaction with the performance of buyer-initiated acquisitions in four of five such transactions.

Carl Whittaker, Bain & Co.

Conditional Welcome Mat Abroad

In contrast to the takeover games played in the United States and Great Britain, West Germany does not lend itself to unfriendly takeover bids, be it for public or privately held targets. Therefore, the entry methods chosen by Japanese industry are not just the consequence of traditions and culture, but of the understanding that much more than just a new position in a limited national market is the point. Most Japanese corporations will be well advised to also consider the full spectrum of effects of their m&a activities in Europe (and elsewhere overseas) on their corporate growth abroad and on the necessary stabilization at home. It should not be overlooked that European Community-member nations might set up further protective barriers against additional product imports from Japan, if Japanese industry does not demonstrate international cooperation on a much broader scale. Therefore, unfriendly bids by Japanese corporations will have negative effects on not just the bidder itself, but on the political and market positioning of Japanese industry as such.

Hans Dahm, Westdeutsche Landesbank

Some Critical Differences

American acquisition decisions and directions typically come down from the top of the organization and reflect the personal strategies and convictions of the chief executive officer. Japanese companies more typically develop their ideas through consensus which starts at lower levels. Acquisition dealings between companies in the U.S. are almost always CEO to CEO. American CEOs don't like to deal with lower-level Japanese committees.

Acquisition opportunities move very fast in the U.S. with large deals often struck over a weekend. This is particularly true of white-knight opportunities, where buyers are sought as alternatives to undesirable hostile buyers. The Japanese system seems to be too slow to respond to the demands of white-knight bidding.

The multibillion dollar values that are placed on many U.S. deals today are indeed mind boggling and difficult for all but a few Japanese companies to consider. The sheer volume of deals produces an apparent flood of deals to consider and process, overtaking systems which require laborious analysis at lower levels to accept or reject further action. Also, the fees charged by American lawyers and investment bankers are very hard for first-time foreign investors to understand and justify.

Robert H. Whitby, Citicorp Investment Bank

Built-in Barriers to Hostile Takeovers

In Japan, there is little need for junk bonds. Funds are available from banks for short term or long term through a bilateral agreement or syndicated loans, and banks are pleased to provide at low interest rates whatever amount of funds are available to them. Therefore, there is little reason for borrowers to request innovative financing techniques. More than 80 percent of funds provided are still from private financial institutions, the majority of which are from major Japanese commercial banks. Financing through bond issue and stock increase accounts for only 12 percent. At the same time, the fact that major financial institutions in Japan are the shareowners of business corporations as well as lenders makes a major difference in the financing of m&a in Japan.

Hostile takeovers are not favored by financial institutions which own 39 percent of the shares of Japanese companies. Another 26 percent of shares is owned by other business corporations. Many of these shareholders are usually companies doing business with each other often through purchase of material, sales of products, marketing relationships, etc., and are holding shares to facilitate long-term business relationships. These companies are in a position to cooperate if a hostile takeover threat occurs and they are requested by the company to increase shareownership to fight the hostile takeover attempt. These are the reasons a hostile takeover attempt is difficult in Japan.

Tadashi Abe, Industrial Bank of Japan

Overseas Alternatives to M&A

The present yen-dollar exchange rate is creating new opportunities for international equity tie-ups:

- ☐ Investments in the West are now cheaper; and
- ☐ Export-dependent Japanese companies need new strategic alliances in order to insure their growth or survival, and many of these companies are potential partners for foreign investors.

We believe that because of the cultural barrier to m&a in Japan, and the reluctance of Japanese investors to accept the greater risk associated with operating foreign companies in the West, minority participation will continue to be preferred over takeovers as a method of market entry for some time to come.

International investors who choose minority participation do so because it offers less risk than the existing alternatives — licensing, joint venturing, or the creation of a wholly owned subsidiary.

John E. Perry, Banque Indosuez

Pressures on Mature Industries

Industries that provided the momentum for Japan's rapid economic growth have matured and are being challenged by competitive production. Trade friction, exchange rate volatility, and other international factors are causing these leading industries to redeploy assets and undertake major restructuring in the form of internationalization and diversification.

In the past, managers relied on internal resources and depended on retained earnings to fund growth. In today's rapidly changing environment, influenced and accelerated by global economic factors, these practices no longer suffice. Management must turn to external sources for international expertise and new strategies to insure survival.

markets. France has a large number of privately owned companies whose owners are willing to listen to offers, according to Francois Faure of Banque Paribas, and "one day or another they will be potential buying targets." The impediment, noted Francis Meyrier of Shearman & Sterling, is relatively tight government regulation and the use of the so-called French solution in which the government will seek a French buyer for a target firm before letting a foreign buyer get control.

Hans Dahm of Westdeutsche Landesbank cited a reverse situation in West Germany where government policy on mergers tends toward ease, but few owners of private companies "are willing to listen to a potential buyer."

Recent Trends in M&A: How the Minnows Stalk the Whales

The U.K.'s merger and acquisition scene of 1986 was spiced by the increased aggressiveness of small miniconglomerates that angled for takeovers of larger companies. Although not always successful, such bids came in a large enough cluster to catch the attention of Richard Mead of Arthur Young. "Such companies tend to be darlings of the stock market not because of their underlying original businesses, which historically ranged from mediocre to appalling, but because of the people who had taken management control of them," Mead pointed out. "Their share prices tend to be quite unjustified in terms of past performance, but are supported by future expectations. Not surprisingly, they have to act fast to use their shares to make their bids."

Stock market transactions have become more pivotal in many m&a situations, especially hostile ones, according to Peter Martin of Kleinwort Benson Limited. They have been used both by buyers to capture important positions in target companies and by defenders who managed to get stock into friendly hands to thwart an unfriendly offer. In one instance, Kleinwort Benson bought a 2.8-percent stake in a client company which helped the target secure a higher bid from the offeror.

Leveraged Buyouts: The U.K.'s Higher Tolerance of Debt

While the British are developing a "bigger appetite for debt," one of the most important developments in the U.K. leveraged buyout market is the increasing availability of mezzanine money — the portion of an LBO's capitalization between senior debt and equity. This was pointed to by Brian Havill of Citicorp who cited the way in which the British market is starting to more closely resemble the LBO arena in the U.S.

Merril Halpern of Charterhouse Group identified the presence of mezzanine financing in the U.S. as a primary impetus to the growth of American leveraged buyouts. "In the U.S., a leveraged buyout group can outbid a corporate buyer because it can wind up with a lower cost of capital and yet pay a higher price," he said. ■

age multiple paid for companies. Most Germans calculate the earnings multiple according to pretax earnings rather than after-tax, since most medium and small companies are registered as limited partnerships (GmbH & Co. KG) and there are different rates of taxation, depending on dividend policy and legal form.

German companies tend to have higher debt-to-equity ratios than their U.S. counterparts. This could be historically based, but it is also a consequence of the limited financial markets and the tax environment that encourages consumption rather than reinvestment. Another German peculiarity is the pension reserves shown on the balance sheet. For many larger companies these may be even greater than the owner's equity and offer a cheap source of capital, because they are long-term obligations to the workers. As long as a company keeps growing, the pension reserves will remain on the books. Normally, German companies do not fund these reserves nor are they managed by outsiders. As a consequence, Germans define cash flow as net profits plus depreciation plus net increase of pension reserves.

Despite these difficulties, the German m&a business should maintain a high level of activity. Companies have substantial cash to invest, and even medium-sized companies now consider acquisitions as a viable route for expansion. The German m&a scene has turned into a sellers' market, and prices for companies have risen. As long as the economy holds up as predicted, this trend will persist, and prices should increase further. German interest in American companies also should continue to be strong. ■

Keeping on Track

Dealmaking activity in the first quarter of 1987 remained strong despite predictions of a massive slowdown following the tax-driven breakneck pace in the fourth quarter of 1986. There were 936 reported merger, acquisition, and divestiture completions each valued at $1 million or more. While that is a far cry from the record-high 1601 deals in the fourth quarter, it was down by only three deals from the more normal third quarter of 1986.

The 388 transactions that disclosed price in the first quarter totaled $31.8 billion, off 60 percent from the record $79.2 billion for the 727 deals that disclosed price in the fourth quarter. Dollar value fell 19 percent from the $39.3 billion for the 438 deals that disclosed price in the third quarter of 1986.

With more than $7.2 billion paid for 34 transactions, chemicals and allied products topped the first quarter's industrial rankings for dollar volume. Three of the quarter's seven deals in the billion-dollar class were in chemicals and all were executed by foreign buyers. These included the $3.1 billion acquisition of Chesebrough-Pond's by Unilever, one of the world's largest consumer brands and packaged goods manufacturers; the $2.7 billion acquisition of Celanese Corp. by Hoechst AG, the West German chemical and pharmaceutical concern; and the $1.1 billion acquisition of Big Three Industries Inc. by L'Air Liquide SA, a French-based producer of industrial gases.

Posting 10 deals valued at more than $4.4 billion, the stone, clay, glass, and concrete industry was second in terms of dollar volume. Banks and bank holding companies ranked third at $3.6 billion and that industry's 38 transactions qualified it as the numerical leader.

The largest deal of the first quarter was the $3.7 billion leveraged buyout of Owens-Illinois Inc. by Kohlberg, Kravis, Roberts & Co. Additional billion-dollar deals included the $1.7 billion leveraged buyout of Lear Siegler by L Acquisition Corp., an investor group organized by Forstmann Little; Wickes Cos.'s $1.2 billion acquisition of Collins & Aikman Corp., a manufacturer of fabrics and wall coverings; and Grand Metropolitan PLC's $1.1 billion acquisition of Heublein Inc., a unit of RJR Nabisco Inc.

Divestitures for the first quarter totaled 271 with the value at more than $7.4 billion. This is a decline from the 521 deals valued at $32.6 billion that were reported for the fourth quarter and a decrease from the 306 deals valued at $12.7 billion for the third quarter.

Nine of the top 25 deals were divestitures. These included UAL's $978.4 million acquisition of Hilton International from Transworld Corp., and Loral Corp.'s $588 million acquisition of Goodyear Aerospace Corp. from Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. Two of the sell-offs — Greyhound Corp.'s $350 million sale of its bus lines and BankAmerica's divestiture of Charles Schwab & Co. for $280 million — were executed through LBOs, and corporate buyers acquired the other seven units.

The first quarter's most active divesting industries were banks and bank holding companies with 26 deals valued at $306.5 million, communications with 25 deals valued at $439.1 million, and nonelectrical machinery with 22 deals valued at $279.2 million.

In terms of dollar volume, the top divesting industries were food and allied products with eight deals valued at $1.1 billion, hotels and lodging places with two deals valued at $978.4 million, and rubber and plastic products with seven deals valued at $596 million.

LBO market is firm

Leveraged buyouts fell to 72 deals valued at nearly $7 billion from the fourth quarter's 128 deals valued at more than $19.4 billion and from 82 deals valued at $10.6 billion in the third quarter of 1986.

Domestic m&a activity decreased to 812 deals valued at $21.1 billion from 1,396 deals valued at $63.2 billion in the fourth quarter and from 803 deals valued at $34.8 billion in the third quarter. Overseas investment in the U.S. totaled 78 deals valued at $10.5 billion in the first quarter against 150 deals valued at $15.4 billion in the fourth quarter and 96 deals valued at $3.4 billion in the third quarter 1986. Foreign buyers executed seven of the top 25 deals. U.S. investment abroad fell to 46 deals valued at $240.5 million from 55 deals valued at $612.8 million in the fourth quarter 1986. □

The $200 Billion Threshold

A New Milestone for M&A Values in 1986

Merger and acquisition activity staged an impressive rebound in the public marketplace in 1986. A total of 316 publicly held targets were acquired, up 20.6 percent from 1985, according to the M&A Data Base. And the dollar value was up even more, 30.6 percent to $95 billion. Although not particularly surprising in view of the general growth of the m&a market to the $200 billion level in 1986, the increased activity in the public segment is not without significance since 1985 had been a down year. Completed transactions fell to 262 from 321 in 1984 and value slipped to $72.7 billion from $76 billion.

The 1985 decline generally was attributed to the huge rise in the stock market that apparently dimmed the appeal of many otherwise attractive targets from a price standpoint. But 1986 presented an added incentive to buy — the desire of many acquirers to complete major deals before the new federal tax law took effect on January 1, 1987. In addition, acquirers appeared to be getting used to the seeming permanence of high stock prices and adjusting their bids accordingly.

Stock market shakes it off

Yet, the 1986 data confirmed two longstanding trends in the m&a market:

— Although publicly held targets usually fetch the highest prices and are involved in the most publicized deals, they represent only one facet of the overall marketplace. In 1986, for example, the dollar value was less than half of all recorded prices in m&a transactions and the 316 deals only 7.5 percent of all m&a completions.

— Even in a year of rising m&a

Acquisitions of publicly held companies rose in 1986 as known prices of all m&a completions passed the $200 billion mark according to updated figures. But private companies remained the dominant acquisition target and the stock market barely felt any loss.

activity involving public targets, the number of completions barely reduces the ranks of publicly held companies and has little impact on total market value.

Two other factors lead to those results:

— Acquisitions of private companies are far more frequent than public company deals. In 1986, six times as many private companies were acquired than publicly held firms. And the number, 1,890, rose from the 1985 level by 50 percent to far outpace the growth in public acquisitions.

— The smaller, lower-priced transaction remains the backbone of m&a activity, at least in numerical terms.

Revised statistics from the M&A Data Base reveal that 1986 m&a activity was even stronger than originally reported. The total number of completions was 4,238 against 3,414 in 1985, marking the fifth successive year of increased activity. And the updated dollar value put known prices above the $200 billion mark for the first time — $200.1 billion compared with $145.3 billion in 1985.

In addition to pure acquisitions of stand-alone public and private companies, the overall data include divestitures — more than 1,300 in 1986 — and purchases of significant equity interests. The number of deals climbed 24.1 percent from 1985 and the recorded dollar value was up 37.1 percent.

New York Stock Exchange-listed targets accounted for barely more than a quarter of the acquired public firms but with combined prices of $75.1 billion they also had 79 percent of the dollar value for public acquisitions and 37.5 percent of the known dollar value for all m&a activity. Indeed, the average size of a deal involving a Big Board company was nearly $905 million and acquisitions of NYSE-listed targets accounted for 43 of 1986's 100 highest-priced deals.

However, the Big Board hardly felt the loss in terms of market value. Combined value of all shares listed on the NYSE was nearly $2.2 trillion as of December 31, 1986, a gain of 12.8 percent from the $1.95 trillion level of December 31, 1985. In calculating the impact of mergers and acquisitions retirements on those levels, M&A assumed that the combined purchase prices approximated the market values of the target companies when the deals were completed because arbitrage activity usually drives up shares to approximately bid prices after a deal is announced. Thus, the $75.1 billion in acquisition prices represented only 3.4 percent of the NYSE market value as of December 31, 1986, and only 3.85 percent of that level a year earlier.

In 1985, 64 Big Board companies were acquired and the dollar value was $57.7 billion. Another 41 public targets were listed on the American Stock Exchange and their combined purchase prices came to $4.3 billion, or an average price of $105 million.

Only one Amex target, Key Pharmaceuticals Inc., acquired by Schering-Plough Corp. for $788.5 million, made the top 100 deals and this transaction alone accounted for close to a fifth of all dollars expended for Amex companies in 1986. M&a activity was significantly higher than in 1985 when only 26 Amex-listed companies were acquired for combined prices of $2.36 billion.

But again, the impact on Amex market value was modest. Total market value rose 10.9 percent to $96.44 billion on December 31, 1986, from $87 billion a year earlier. As a result, the purchase prices of Amex-listed companies were only 4.5 percent of the year-end 1986 market value and only 5 percent of the total market value a year earlier.

Numerically, the heaviest activity among public companies was in the

over-the-counter market where there were 187 deals or three-fifths of all acquisitions of publicly owned targets. But dollar value of $15.4 billion, was only 8 percent of the total outlays for public companies, and the average deal size, $82.2 million, was the smallest in the three major equity markets.

Five OTC targets were logged among the 100 highest priced deals. Quotron Corp. was acquired by Citicorp for $657.6 million, Third National Corp. by SunTrust Banks for $651.1 million, Suburban Bancorp by Sovran Financial for $546.7 million, Jackson National Life Insurance by Prudential Corp. PLC for $597 million, and Arizona Bancwest by Security Pacific for $480.1 million. These five deals alone, totaling about $3 billion, accounted for 20 percent of the dollar value in OTC targets. Actually, the total deals involving OTC targets was up only modestly from 169 in 1985 while the dollar value climbed from $12.5 billion, for a 23.5 percent increase.

The market value of all stocks on the NASDAQ system at the close of 1986 was $362.6 billion, up 26.2 percent from the $287.3 billion level that prevailed 12 months earlier. The combined prices of acquired OTC companies represented 4.2 percent of the NASDAQ market values at the end of 1986 and 5.4 percent of the value at the close of 1985.

Although accounting for only a fraction of all m&a transactions and less than half of 1986 known dollar value, public company acquisitions have significance far beyond their numbers. For one thing, they set the tone for pricing acquisitions of comparable companies in the private market, where, numerically at least, the acquisition pace has been the strongest.

Private companies go for far smaller prices than public targets on average, but exact pricing and total values are hard to come by. For example, although the M&A Data Base obtained pricing data on virtually all public acquisitions, prices were revealed on but 528 of the 1,890 private targets, or less than a third. The known prices added up to $22 billion, a significant amount but obviously far less than the exact total.

At the lower end

However, whether in the public or the private market, the smaller deal remains by far the more common m&a transaction.

A breakdown provided by the M&A Data Base of deals that involved straight acquisitions or substantial investments in stand-alone companies showed that 83.3 percent of private company transactions with known deal values were priced at lower than $50 million and 74.2 percent were less than $25 million. In the public market, where large deals are more common, 72.8 percent went for less than $50 million and 61.8 percent at less than $25 million.

Interestingly, one of every 12 private company acquisitions was for $100 million or more. In the public market, the proportion was nearly one in five.
